

Animal Ethics

Animal ethics is about asking the question: what are the right and wrong ways to treat animals?

Why care about animals?

In the past, most people believed that non-human animals didn't have feelings or intelligence. It was thought that animals weren't important and that they existed simply for people to use for food, clothing, transport, labour and entertainment. However, as human society has advanced, we have come to realise that animals do matter. We now know that animals are capable of feeling physical pain just like we are. We also know that they experience emotions such as fear, sadness, loneliness and depression.

What rights do animals need?

No-one suggests that animals should have the same rights as people. The right to vote, or to freedom of speech, for example, would make no sense to a dog.

But the right not to be tortured or hurt unnecessarily is as important to an animal as it is to a person. And the right not to be imprisoned is important, too. We know, for example, that social animals, such as monkeys and mice, suffer emotional distress when they are kept on their own in captivity.

Which animals have rights?

Many animals are described as being sentient, because, as already noted, they have feelings and emotions, and can experience physical pain. It's not just mammals and birds who are sentient. We know that many other animals, including fish, lobsters and octopuses can also feel pain. Even when we cannot be certain that animals experience pain, for example in the case of worms or insects, it would seem reasonable to give them the benefit of the doubt and avoid harming them.

Animal rights versus animal welfare

Animal rights supporters think that it is morally wrong to exploit animals for any reason. Animal welfare people believe that it is OK to use animals, as long as they are looked after and their suffering is kept to a minimum.

The difference between the two philosophies has been summed up like this: Animal rights people are campaigning for no cages, while animal welfare people are campaigning for bigger cages.

Some arguments against animal rights

Animals don't understand...

Some people argue that animals can't have rights because they don't understand or know what it means to have rights. However, defenders of animal rights point out that young babies and people with severe mental disabilities also don't understand the idea, yet this does not prevent us from giving them rights. Furthermore, animals such as adult chimpanzees are more aware of what's going on around them than are human babies.

Animals are not intelligent...

Other people say that animals cannot be granted rights because they are not as intelligent as human beings. But if you think about it, your rights don't depend on how intelligent you are – if you achieved an A in your exam, it wouldn't mean that you have any more basic rights than someone who got a Fail.

Animals hurt one another...

It is sometimes argued that animals are cruel to each other, so people should not feel bad about abusing animals. It is true that some animals kill other animals in order to eat them. The difference is that these animals are not knowingly cruel – they are simply behaving naturally and are not aware of the suffering that they cause. A lion doesn't know that he is hurting a gazelle, but he does know that he has to kill to survive. Humans on the other hand are aware that other animals can suffer and they can decide to change their actions accordingly.

Religious views

Buddhism and Jainism

A central principle of Jainism and Buddhism is ahimsa, which means non-violence and harmlessness.

The doctrine of karma teaches that any wrong behaviour, such as cruel acts to animals, will have to be paid for in a future life. Similarly, good behaviour, such as kindness to animals, will be rewarded.

Buddhists believe that it is wrong to hurt or kill animals. Jains believe that animals, like humans, have souls and that each of these souls is considered of equal value and should be treated with respect and compassion. Today, about half of all followers of Buddhism are vegetarian. Jains are strict vegetarians and are also not allowed to do jobs that cause harm to animals.

Christianity

The Biblical story of creation decreed that humans were created in the image of God and given dominion over the rest of creation. The term dominion was taken by early Christians to mean that human beings have power over non-human animals. It was also generally considered that animals didn't have souls.

Most Christians these days agree that human dominion over nature means stewardship rather than domination and exploitation.

Hinduism

Ahimsa, an important belief in Hinduism, teaches kindness and non-violence towards all living things including animals.

Hindus believe in reincarnation, which means rebirth into a higher or lower existence, determined by how we live our lives; this is the law of karma. Hindus believe that animals, like humans, have souls.

Being vegetarian is highly respected, because of the principle of non-violence (ahimsa) and the doctrine of karma (harming animals is bad karma).

The cow is greatly revered by Hindus and is regarded as sacred. Killing cows is banned in India and Hindus do not eat beef products.

Islam

The Qur'an says that animals were created for people to use: It is God who provided for you all manner of livestock, that you may ride on some of them and from some you may derive your food. And other uses in them for you to satisfy your heart's desires. Qur'an 40:79-80

However, Muslims are instructed to avoid treating animals cruelly. Mohammed is quoted as saying: You will be rewarded by Allah for your acts of kindness towards living creatures.

Muslims are allowed to eat only halal meat that has been killed according to Sharia law (see below).

Judaism

Judaism teaches that animals should be treated with compassion because they are part of God's creation.

Genesis states that God has given human beings dominion over all living things. Dominion is usually interpreted as stewardship – living things are to serve humanity, but human beings are required to look after all living creatures. Hunting for sport is forbidden.

Observant Jews should eat only meat that has been killed in the approved way, called shechita (see below).

Sikhism

Sikhs believe in reincarnation, which means people live many lives on Earth, some of these in the form of animals.

Sikhs believe that all animals have souls, but that human life is more important than animal life. A guiding principle for Sikhs is guardianship - it is the duty of human beings to take care of animals and to avoid harming them.

Sikhs follow the Jhatka method of slaughter. This means that the animal must be killed as quickly as possible so that the animal experiences as little suffering as possible.

Religious slaughter

UK law normally requires animals to be stunned first so that they are unconscious when they are killed. However, an exception is made in the case of religious slaughter which often involves cutting the animal's throat while they are conscious. The Arabic word halal means permissible, and the rules of slaughter are based on Sharia (Islamic) law. According to the British Halal Food Authority, certain methods of stunning are permissible. The Jewish method of slaughter called shechita cannot involve pre-slaughter stunning at all.

Animal Aid undercover films have shown that even when animals are pre-stunned, they are often still conscious (and can therefore feel pain), when their throats are cut, because of the poor running of slaughterhouses.
